Apoptosis is a highly regulated event involved in the development and homeostasis of the immune system. The aim of the present study was to explore whether apoptosis of human leukocytes is associated with changes in antithrombin III (AT-III) binding to alpha-2-macroglobulin (alpha-2-M), which may be a relevant event in the regulation of coagulation. Apoptosis of leukocytes induced by activation of the caspase-3/p35 pathway was evaluated by Annexin V staining. The binding of AT-III to alpha-2-M was analyzed by a colorimetric method. AT-III binding to alpha-2-M in peripheral blood leukocytes increased during apoptosis of monocytes and neutrophils. AT-III binding was enhanced for apoptotic cells incubated with a factor XI-activating antibody. The increase in AT-III binding to alpha-2-M was inhibited by anti-alpha-2-M antibodies. AT-III binding to alpha-2-M may be a relevant event in the regulation of coagulation during apoptosis of leukocytes. For many of us, gas pumps can look intimidating and scary.
