To be honest, the few you see in popular use are actually very old and are almost unusable. Yes, the numbers are ridiculous and the inability to accurately measure the industry will drive the numbers sky high, but more companies should look seriously at producing and using lens correction software. Far too many people use macro lenses, lenses that only give a small focal range and "macro" lenses. The Tamron 28-300 is the most popular lens for Apple users and the Samsung 28-300 is next. It costs less than $100 . Many of the lenses that have macro functions come in a range of focal lengths of 24mm, 25mm and 28mm, I think the first part of your assessment is absolutely correct, and that is whilst working with DNGs. I've noticed a speed benefit when import a large number of shots, but then the performance plummets when I move over to developing mode. Something that does lower performance, but not necessarily by a huge margin is using many layers within a single image. Fortunately you can turn off the smart previews to work with the DNG, but if you're planning to continue using JPEGs within the same project as the DNGs then I would recommend disabling them all together. They may include some performance benefits to you and we will update this as soon as we hear something more specific. We think that the performance improvements will continue to be positive moving forward and are working to make all the necessary changes to the product to accommodate the use of JPEG as a preview.
