A semiconductor device is fabricated by forming a plurality of patterns on a semiconductor substrate. Patterns can include, for example, a gate pattern, a source/drain pattern, etc. The patterns may be formed by performing an etching process to etch a hard mask formed on the semiconductor substrate. As a material for the hard mask, a material having excellent resistance to damage by a plasma etching process and having a high etch selectivity with respect to the semiconductor substrate, such as a silicon-based material, is generally used. However, as the degree of integration of semiconductor devices increases, it has become difficult to form patterns having a desired line width using a single hard mask. Therefore, it is necessary to form patterns using a hard mask and a spacer that is formed at both sides of the hard mask. Accordingly, the area of a semiconductor substrate that is used for forming patterns is increasing. To solve such a problem, a pillar spacer method is suggested. For example, the pillar spacer method is used to form a source/drain pattern having a highly uniform line width. This method, however, has a limitation on forming fine patterns. Moreover, it is difficult to perform a uniform etching process for a multi-layer hard mask.Rodney F. Streater Private Rodney F. Streater was a World War I flying ace credited with five aerial victories. World War I Streater served in the infantry before being commissioned as a flying cadet in April 1917. He flew for the 80th Aero Squadron during the summer of 1917, and was confirmed in his permanent rank of second lieutenant on 17 August. After being transferred to the 94th Aero Squadron, he was promoted to first lieutenant on 1 December. Streater and his squadron were deployed to the Western Front on 22 May 1918. He initially began attempting to claim aerial victories over German aircraft using a Voisin airplane that was tail-dragging, and was rapidly given leave to re-equip with a Spad. While using the first Spad, he scored his first confirmed victory on 1 July 1918. His last victory, over 04aeff104c
