EASYFIRE V. 5; STUDY: EASYFIRE '05 ~CENSUS GAMING.Q: Just how sturdy are Super Offset wheels? So I was looking at the Trek Speed Concept Shoe and in the process of developing a manufacturing schedule I noted that most of the Prototek SRAM Super Offset wheels were rated for a 190 to 220lb impulse on the rear axles. So I did some research and found out that's 50% of the spec that the wheels are rated for. My question is, just how solid are these wheels. They look awesome but are they just a marketing gimmick? My guess is the wheels are built like the threadless 6 speed hubs and not like the 11 speed ones that are extremely solid. Am I right or is there a big difference? I'm looking for a confirmed answer on how well the wheels would hold up in a fall/stumble. A: They are built and designed to hold up fairly well, the major difference is that the spokes are not "bladed". The sidewall of the spoke heads aren't tapered, and no part of the bore is tapered away from the wheel body. Also, not all Super Offset wheels are made the same. Different manufacturers use different spokes/injection mold. I think some of the TCS's are made by China, because they have a lot of stock around. I believe Jenson is the only US manufacturer. A: The TCS shocks are made by G-Clamp I would take a fall on them. They are one of the best shocks on the market. They are also cheaper than a TCS shock. The only difference is that they are more open. If you have the chance, try them out. You can always use just the rear shock, and use a front shock/spring/cage. Glyphosate and AMPA in the urine of a population of highly exposed workers. The aim of this study is to verify the presence of glyphosate 04aeff104c
