Unemployment Insurance Amendments of 1977 (Public Law 95-630; P.L. 95-595) Principal Investigator(s): U.S. Department of Labor Summary: The 1977 legislation was enacted in an effort to alleviate the impact of rising inflation on public support for unemployment insurance. Among the provisions in the bill were changes in unemployment insurance benefits, collection and distribution of data for estimating benefits, and changes in the filing period for unemployment insurance claims. The data contain employment status records for the five-month period December 1977 to May 1978 for four states: California, Michigan, Massachusetts, and New York. Each record includes the state of residence for the claimant on the last day the claimant was employed for a period between 7 and 26 weeks, employment income reported in 1969 dollars on the last day the claimant was employed, information on the basis of which the claimant is currently eligible for benefits (currently receiving or will likely receive benefits), employment status and weeks worked at the current employment, and employment status at the previous job. The employment status for records in the first two states is based on information in the claimant's completed forms and on information reported for the claimant by the employer. The unemployment status for records in California and New York is based on information reported by claimants. This information includes the number of months since the claimant was first unemployed and how the claimant identified the applicant's first unemployment within the previous year. This study collected data from November 1977 to April 1978. Unemployment Insurance Amendments of 1977 (Public Law 95-630; P.L. 95-595) Un
