Camera RAW support from Lightroom and Camera selector – Using RAW (on changing the format of your images, you'll see a three-pane window, as shown here.) It's just like by using RAW in Photo (and Lightroom if you are using it as well), except this time Adobe Source Camera RAW is actually editing the image in Photoshop (images imported through this workflow are typically JPEGs). Choosing a video editor is like selecting your pair of running shoes: Buy the best you can afford. That said, I've always preferred Adobe to the competition, and I've come to think of it as a slightly different type of program. In an ever-growing number of ways, Photoshop serves as a digital paintbrush, and is a far more sophisticated design tool than any other app. And while these rumors are far less than 100 percent true, they're not entirely far-fetched either. But Adobe's willingness to keep the product alive and well elsewhere seems to suggest a willingness to stay with the Mac platform. Photoshop has always been better on the Mac than anything else out there, and for years, it's been the most important reason for me to buy a Mac. Collaborations have become a strength of the Adobe family of products. Adobe's latest version of Lightroom allows image collaborations between a set number of people. With this functionality, users have the ability to present images in different areas. Teams of people can all work on the same image, asynchronously. Adobe has given us a number of hints that Lightroom/Adobe Camera Raw 6.1 is coming. First and foremost is the new, public beta of version 19, the most recent beta. In addition, we've learned that Lightroom 6.1 will support Fujifilm X-Trans RAW files. Lastly, we've seen the bevvy of recent updates to Lightroom including the ability to add Pin points, the Design Center, and new versions of the global color lookup and image colors panels. Is this when Lightroom/Adobe Camera Raw 6.1 will be released? Perhaps.
