Q: Can I compress a file inside another file without extracting the compressed file to a temporary location? I am implementing a method to solve a Rubik's Cube and a part of the algorithm requires me to compress a file inside a file. The thing is that I want this to be as efficient as possible so I want to avoid having to extract the compressed file to a temporary location. What would be the most efficient way to do this? The idea is that I can just give a bit of memory to my program and tell it to compress a file in-place. A: Don't reinvent the wheel. First, you can compress using gzip: `gzip -c file.xyz > file.xz` It won't detect any compression problems, it will produce the best possible output, and it will handle any non-gzip files without creating an additional file, but it will handle any gzipped files without decompressing them first. Then, as far as I know, it is the only compression tool that can do in-place compression without opening a temporary file. Effects of phytic acid and lysine on the antioxidant status of broiler chickens (Gallus gallus domesticus). The objective of the study was to assess the efficacy of supplementation with two combinations of lysine and phytic acid (LP) on the antioxidant status of broiler chickens. On the 56th day of life, the broilers were divided into two subgroups of 16 replicates each (six per subgroup), in terms of the amount of selenium (Se) added: 0.2 ppm (control) and 0.3 ppm. In the other subgroup, the broilers were fed a diet without supplemented Se and supplemented with lysine + phytic acid (L + P) at 0.3 %, compared to the 0.2 % control group. The treatment groups were fed a diet for three weeks. The antioxidant potential of the liver and kidney was determined
