Selection tools, including the Brush and Pencil, allow you to quickly paint on images, drawings, or videos. The new Content Aware fill tool uses the surrounding context to represent the content in areas of uncertain quality. The content aware fill tool doesn't replace existing fill tools, however. It's more of a new tool for filling content-free areas of an image. The Layers panel, used for the preceding three tools, has been completely rebuilt and is now front and center. You can now click directly on a layer to bring it to front for editing without clearing it from its current position. The DNG Converter is updated with support for DNG 2.0, EXIF, and GPS metadata support. The Object Browser also has replaced thumbnails with previews for each of the images. You can nudge to focus on a specific area of the image "hand" view, and search to find the extreme points of a vector shape. A new Transparency Clipping Mask option toggles all clone overlap areas. The new Content-Aware Mask editor displays live mask preview (even layered masks) so you can see how changes will affect the image. The new Masking & Gradient Editor has many features including Live Mask Preview that are useful for updating masks in real time. The in-place vector-based Gradient tool now supports all blending modes including the Recolor Exclusion mode. The Stroke dialog now has an optional Sample button to fill selections with colors from the image. New gradient gradients with lightening/darkening effects are also available. The Save Swatch for Gradient dialog can auto-create swatches. Use the new Freeform gradient tool to draw radial gradients.

First, next to last, and possibly least anticipated, is something else which you would have expected from the end of 2019, normality. I'm talking about the death of Photoshop Elements, which I last updated back during the Summer of 2019 after the New Horizons missions on Pluto turned out not to be what they had anticipated. A lot of effort went in to producing a photo editor which was very good at what it does, but even that is not what it was hyped up to be: a days work from camera to laptop within seconds. Mostly everyone's first reaction to Elements on camera is something along the lines of "I can't be doing that in Elements!" It's also true that the so-called cool kids, the Instagrammers, the people producing videos with action shots or action people, among others, can already produce HD video with layered effects and special effects in real time on the camera - in most cases also post-processing, but its definitely no DSLR and certainly no pentax or whatever the current big brands are shooting with these days. Adobe never really brought the price down in Elements once it was released on the PC, if we except the very last version which was already free. Especially considering the ecosystem is shrinking more and more with each passing day and the inability to actually produce good color managed images is only driven deeper and deeper by the brand owners and the media. That's why I have no plans of buying Elements at the moment as it will be a very similar beast to what I have canceled and, to the best of my understanding, very few people will buy it because they have had enough of the limited capabilities and limited features. Plus, and this is a very different war than the Photoshop battles of the previous decade - there's no sign of DxO or some other independent body judging the photos, but instead the Adobe movement is moving the goals, generally to a much more basic level, while simultaneously making more precise the photographers' lives with the new features they are pushing at them. It's really a matter of quality control and consistency rather than anything else. In a sense, a lot of it is polishing a product instead of creating something new. In the old days we were all used to 'grind' on the same quality controls through the software. We didn't have different auto white balance, we didn't have this massive menu system in "updated" versions that we have to go through for everything, we just worked with it and got used to it - which of course, was exactly the point of the crazy control panel. You only have to tweak those things with very small controls to get a feel for the quality and nothing more.
